Guide the future STEM workforce to success

Join the College of Science and Mathematics on Monday, March 19, 2018 at 6:30 pm for a networking experience guaranteed to be enriching for both students and professionals alike. Speak one-on-one with students for an hour and help students navigate the professional community through networking. This fast-paced event offers STEM (science, technology, engineering and math) students guidance and experience on how to connect with the professional community and gain insight into pathways to succeed in STEM fields. The opportunity to meet industry professionals opens a window of new possibilities for many STEM students as they discover the importance of industry skills needed, the value of making career connections through networking, and practical advice to be successful.
